From an acquaintance with the stale of business, and the general situation of merchants in the city of New York; from personal observation of the immediate effects of the recent calamity; and from inquiry into the probable extent of its wide-spread consequences, I have been convinced of the importance, nay, of the absolute necessity of some early provision, on the part of this Government, for the relief of its debtors in that city; and, upon reflection, 1 am satisfied that it is not more the impulse of liberality than the obvious dictate of sound policy to do at least all that is proposed in this hill. The hill provides for two objects: first, the relief of such...
