At peace above its mounds of slain, Heaven wove with stars her shining skein. Beside his tent, austere as stone, Napoleon stood and mused alone. His eyes (an eagles in their light) Lifted, and swept the voids of night. That hour was born within his breast The Titans anguish of unrest. He felt his spirit tower, aspire, With insolence of new desire. All victories he had won oer men Seemed slight and immaterial then. He craved in many another land Conquest a millionfold more grand. He thrilled with all the strange distress Of superhuman selfishness. And while his vision rose and sought Those throngs of stars, he thought this thought: In every orb of these I mark, That pierce with fire the dome of dark, In every world that beams afar, In each distinguishable star, I long to reach, as at this hour, A glory and plenitude of power, And live through time till time be done, Imperially Napoleon! Engar Fawcett. Pari, 1884. Wild Flowers. A FIR-TREE is not a flower, and yet it is associated in my mind with primroses. There was a narrow lane leading into a wood, where I used to go almost every day in the early months of the year, and at one corner it was overlooked by three spruce firs. The rugged lane there began to ascend the hill, and I paused a moment to look back. Immediately the high fir-trees guided the eye upwards, and from their tops...
